Interruptions are a frequent occurrence in a software development process. They happen when a problem with a user or the software itself comes up. Interruptions are unavoidable, as we cannot predict when problems will come up. The more often problems happen, the more we need to prepare for these. If a user is not well informed about the software or something else goes wrong, the development team may have to respond to him. If a problem is discovered on the software itself the development team needs to deal with that in order to be able to fix it. Sometimes errors and bugs are introduced during testing phase. Interruptions can also be seen as a natural consequence of a good product development process. The development team will test and prioritize each feature. That means they will implement the features they think will be useful first. If they find a bug along the way, it will probably be the first (and not the last!) bug they fix. Therefore, 3e33713323
