We have found that in the IAP test, a decrease in the force recorded for a fixed velocity is significantly correlated with rapid HLA-DQ typing [RSTA20150296C11].

Although the method has not been validated for other alleles, it is unlikely that the use of this or other appropriate methods will be limited by the current level of typing accuracy for DQ α 1,4. However, as in any method, every allele would need to be evaluated, not just the major histocompatibility complex alleles that are used routinely for multilocus gene typing. What levels of accuracy are needed? This question can only be answered by (i) the development of standard criteria for assessment of the performance of typing methods and (ii) the simultaneous measurement of typing performance across many different typing methods. There will be a need to develop and validate methods for complete HLA typing in which the quality of typing is rigorously assessed and by which comparison across different alleles can be made. (b).
