The Nokia Lumia 920, the successor to last year's flagship Lumia 800, is now available at U.S. T-Mobile stores nationwide for AT&T customers. The retail price of the phone is $99.99 with a 2-year commitment and $549 with the Manufacturer's Recertification Program (MRP). As before, U.S. T-Mobile customers can also take advantage of T-Mobile's No-Contract Evolution plan with MetroPCS. It's certainly not "normal" for a phone to cost $549, especially not for a phone that isn't yet released, but T-Mobile does it anyway. T-Mobile is offering the phone as part of its No-Contract Evolution plan, which means that customers can pay $25 per month for 28 months and it would then be added to their monthly bill for the remaining 10 months. Of course, the device can be upgraded to Windows Phone 8 (via the Windows Phone Store) at any time during the first 12 months of the phone's life, then every subsequent 12 months thereafter. The phone will also include access to T-Mobile's 4G network, which is currently the fastest in the United States. The phone sports a 4.5-inch, 1280 x 768 display, a 8-megapixel PureView camera with Carl Zeiss optics, a 1.5GHz dual-core Qualcomm Snapdragon S3 processor, integrated aD-GLQ mobile broadband radio and a host of Windows Phone 8 features.Q: How to clean up ggplot2 code in a loop I am attempting to write a loop in ggplot2 that calls different columns in data frames in a set of vectors. my code looks like: for(i in my_set){
