What's new in Iron Sky Invasion: Deluxe Content:

Continuing our look into some of the summer's best cinema offerings, the On an Average Day team takes a look at the visual and narrative versatility of Wes Anderson's Moonrise Kingdom. Whether introducing young libertarians to Latin American film, watching Woody Allen retell a familiar narrative, or romancing a long lost love, the summer is heavy with film that embraces the past, projects innovative new content, and takes in the people who continue to make it happen. In this installment I am joined by three On an Average Day contributors who like myself, feel the excitement of new things. Shane Healey is an editor and film scholar who still finds the world fascinating, even as he grows into adulthood. He's clearly a proud Woodstock, CO-native, but you'll probably see him sipping prosecco on the couch in an old Columbia University sweatshirt. Shane has over 250 publications dating to 1989 and is the author of numerous books, including the recently released 2012 Film Book of the Year: Away from Her, and he has directed over 100 independent features. His list of heritages includes: American Horror Story, A Little Princess, Field of Dreams, Arsenic & Old Lace, House, Tombstone, Die Hard 2, American Beauty, and 2009 Palme d'Or winner J'ai tué un Roukh. His book F.W.M. was just reissued by Duke University Press, and is now being showcased in the popular Dean Keaw's Stuff series. Mikel Hemmings is a Seattle native, born to be a film buff. With a background in animation he has contributed to over a dozen films including The Wicker Man, The Painted Veil, and Die Hard 2. He currently freelances as a production designer. He continues to challenge his creative abilities by experimenting with cameras and computers. Helena Pechovanova is a CalArts grad who now calls California home, but continued her film education in Prague. This past year Helena graduated from the directing program of ikonc, and collaborated with her sister Hana on their feature short Bikeman, which is currently screening in the Czech Republic. She's excited to be returning to ikonc in September to watch the program in its entirety. She's particularly proud of her Brie Larson slam dunk, but has much to be excited about. As a student she made her very first pan-African/African American short, Choko and Chico/Pasteles en
