Opioid efficacy for neuropathic pain: assessing patient selection and outcomes in a real-world clinical setting. To compare the efficacy of opioids at 2 medical centers in chronic pain patients with neuropathic pain (NP) or central pain (CP) and identify predictors of poor response to opioids. Retrospective cohort study. The medical records of patients with NP or CP receiving opioids for  $\geq 1$  month were examined. Pain and disability measures were used to assess pain and functional outcomes. The cohort had a mean age of  $46.6 \pm 10.7$  years, 66% were female, and the pain duration was  $15.7 \pm 12.5$  months. The NP group had higher mean pain, disability, and opioid doses compared with the CP group. NP patients taking  $\leq 3$  opioids were more likely to receive additional medications compared with the CP patients taking  $\geq 3$  opioids (OR=4.01, 95% CI=1.45-11.23). The opioid dose and time were associated with pain and disability changes. The more opioids patients had taken in the first 3 months, the more likely they were to have greater gains in disability. The pain severity and disability, opioid dose, and times of opioid treatment all impact the changes in pain and disability. The more opioids patients have been prescribed, the more likely they are to have a greater change in pain and disability. Apple's new iPhone 8 and iPhone 8 Plus will be the first iPhones to use Face ID, which is a new facial recognition system for unlocking your phone. Face ID uses a dual-camera and two infrared dots to identify a user. It was reportedly tested in conjunction with Google's recently announced Project Soli wireless technology. Apple introduced Face ID at its Apple Watch event on September 12. But a growing number of Android users reported that the feature works poorly and that their phones can't recognize them using facial recognition. Google says that the new iPhone's Face ID works as advertised on the surface, but pointed out some limitations. But there are concerns that the iPhone 8 and 8 Plus won't work in certain situations, including certain lighting conditions, and there are reports of a bug that makes the phone misread a user's face in some circumstances. ❖

Register of the Maryland State Archives, a historical newspaper from the 19th century, recently announced the completion of digitization of the Maryland State Archives. “The Archives has received an unprecedented level of interest since receiving the 2007 Richard J. Starkey Award from The Association for Public History,” said Rosemary N. Wilmot, special collections manager.
“The Starkey Award is given for outstanding project to document the public history collections of an archival institution. It includes the development and completion of a website to make the archival holdings available to the public. The State Archives also received a Preservation Fellowship Award in 2008 from the Maryland Historical Trust. The project was funded by the Maryland State Archives as a demonstration project to complete the first step of this project. The multimedia project will be used by all divisions of the Archives, as well as the public. “The Archives’ History Research Center has completed the production of a DVD
