This device will allow the patient to automatically turn on the light at night and set the desired position of the headlamp. Phase I goals include the design and construction of a small-scale prototype and the evaluation of its performance in a pilot study of home environment lighting. The economic feasibility of the device is documented as is its potential impact on sleep quality. The impact of the headlamp on the nocturnal heart rate is also evaluated. The feasibility and potential impact of the device is directly related to patient illumination in the home. The normal quality of sleep is maintained in a natural home environment. However, nighttime awakenings occur when the home lighting is too bright. If this device could help patients feel more comfortable in their home environment, it may improve their sleep quality and relieve their distress. This will lead to fewer visits to health care providers and improved patient compliance. As a result, long-term studies can be initiated to further determine the clinical effectiveness of the device in the home environment. The adjustable-work light device will allow patients to increase their home lighting by activating the device. This will enable them to obtain the light and dark required for sleep. The device will be designed so that the patient can activate it by turning on the light using a control
