Here I'm wondering why it recommends to avoid it for POST requests. If you look at the policy docs, you can see in the section using the CORS policy (last paragraph) the following: These rules provide guidance for dealing with cross-origin requests. A cross-origin request is any request made to a different origin from the origin of the requesting script. Cross-origin requests are limited by default for security reasons. Note: Sending data in response to a request without a secure connection (is not considered a cross-origin request; this will not be allowed via the CORS policy. but in the following section: If your application only wants to accept cross-origin requests coming from a narrow set of origins, you can use the same-origin policy. Why does it recommend to avoid CORS for POST requests when you could also use the same-origin policy for the same requests? Isn't it the same policy? A: Why does it recommend to avoid CORS for POST requests when you could also use the same-origin policy for the same requests? Isn't it the same policy? Because when CORS is supported a simple preflight request is used to test whether the request is allowed in the context of a given origin, and if it's not, it's the same origin policy that kicks in to check if the cross origin request can be performed.
